

Health Care Congressional Investigations (United States)

Overview

In recent years, executives from every corner of the health care industry have found themselves in the hot glare of television lights as they raise their right hand and are sworn to tell the truth by the chairman of a congressional investigative committee. Scores of health plans, hospitals, pharmaceutical companies and other entities have received subpoenas and letters of inquiry and been summoned to meet with congressional investigators.

Few events are as overwhelming and challenging as becoming the subject of a US congressional investigation. When the stakes are at their highest, you need a proven fighter with the necessary legal, political and public relations acumen to stand by your side.

Dentons' Health Care practice group understands the potential pitfalls and dangers associated with congressional inquiries. That's why we work directly with you on every aspect of managing the potential legal liabilities of congressional oversight and subpoena authority to ensure your rights and reputation are protected. The Dentons' Health Care practice group works with a multidisciplinary team which offers decades of experience on Capitol Hill and in the executive branch, along with deep background in public relations and crisis communications campaigns.

Given the stakes, only a partner with the substantive knowledge of industry and regulatory issues, deep political expertise, knowledge of key staff, political sensitivities and the media impact of a congressional investigation can help you effectively navigate your risk. Dentons' Health Care practice group is ready to provide the breadth of experience you need to protect what's important to you.
