

Overview

When you are purchasing an operating business from a large corporation in a spin-out transaction, you need to make sure you have identified the full package of contractual and IP rights and related personnel you will need to run the business successfully after the closing. Dentons' lawyers have in-depth experience analyzing integrated businesses and fashioning effective purchase and transition services documents so the purchaser is assured of acquiring exactly the assets needed to run the business on a stand-alone basis going forward.

We have deep market knowledge in spin-out transactions, and whether you are a fund or a corporate buyer, Dentons will help you identify the exact set of post-closing transition services needed and the customary market terms under which such services are provided.

Our corporate and IP teams, together with our employment, benefits and labor law teams, work together seamlessly. We provide industry-focused advice when it comes to IP transition and licensing, as well as transitional employment services and benefits arrangements, which are critical components in successfully separating an acquired business from its existing corporate platform.

With experience in hundreds of transactions, Dentons' lawyers are perfectly positioned to provide you with the best possible advice and help you structure your spin-out transaction from the outset.
