

Overview

In the heart of Central America, Honduras borders Nicaragua, El Salvador and Guatemala. It also has the largest Caribbean coast line of all of the Central American countries.

Although the economy relies heavily on a narrow range of exports, notably bananas and coffee, Honduran Government policies have been friendly towards foreign private investment, including in the tourism industry as well as in shared service centers and business process outsourcing (BPO), by streamlining procedures and eliminating a series of administrative obstacles involved in the process of establishing a company through the adoption of new legislation. Great strides are also being taken to modernize the social and economic infrastructure with Public Private Partnerships arrangements.
